

1981 DIRECTORY
OF
FOREST TREE NURSERIES IN THE UNITED STATES

This Directory is primarily to facilitate the work of those engaged in reforestation activities. Data was furnished by the nurserymen; the publisher appreciates their splendid cooperation.

The last such Directory was produced in 1976 and contained 190 entries. This 1980 version lists 305 nurseries, many of them private nurseries not formerly listed.

About the Cover:

Tree seedling culture in nurseries is certainly not a recent development. Mr. W.S. Clime of the USDA—Forest Service took the cover photograph in 1914 at the Wasatch Nursery of the Wasatch National Forest in Utah. All of the seedlings shown have been hand transplanted from seedbeds to the location shown. The transplanting process resulted in huskier planting stock having a more fibrous root system. Many studies have shown that trees treated this way usually survive and grow better when planted in the forest, but, of course, the seedlings are more costly to produce.

In such early Forest Service Nurseries the District Ranger was usually also the Nurseryman. The fellow in the foreground, wearing knee-high lace-up boots and inspecting the trees, is probably the Ranger.

All the work done in these old nurseries was by hand or horsepower. Note the irrigation water spigots (on the left) to attach hoses to. However, labor was relatively cheap (less than $1.00 per day in many instances) and the Rangers of the fledgling Forest Service drove their men hard. Normally transplanters were paid a piece work rate for every 1,000 trees transplanted. If they could not transplant at least several thousand per day they were "fired."
